Media Release

Archer Magazine – a new Australian journal for sexual diversity
9 October 2013

Archer Magazine is a new Australian print publication that aims to capture a snapshot of Australia's attitudes to sexual diversity in 2013.

Launched in Melbourne by journalist and editor, Amy Middleton (The Bulletin, Australian Geographic, Rolling Stone), this new print magazine is unlike anything the Australian media has seen before.

The magazine's crowd-funding campaign through Pozible raised a staggering $20,000 for the first print edition.

Christos Tsiolkas (author of Australian bestseller The Slap) joins 12 emerging Australian writers covering topics including

- The adult sexual desire for youth
- Why straight sex is just as queer
- Urban beats: culture and etiquette
- Sex and censorship in Australian film
- The history of queer publishing in Australia

These thought-provoking articles will be flanked by images from emerging and established Australian photographers including Kelly-ann Denton, Greg Bricknell, Claire Martin and James Brickwood.

"Each issue of Archer will date quickly in terms of commentary and photography, leaving behind a relic of the sexual equality movement," says editor Amy Middleton. "The response to Archer so far has been so positive – I think most people agree that a new media outlet that deals with these issues is vital in Australia right now."
